US dollar skims 4-year low after Trump comments

THE greenback steadied on Wednesday (Jan 28), but was still set for its biggest weekly fall since April 2025, after US President Donald Trump brushed off this month's slide, prompting concern from European central bankers over the strength of the euro.

As investors have grown increasingly nervous about their exposure to US assets, other currencies and gold have shot up in recent weeks.

The euro topped US$1.20 for the first time since 2021, the pound hit 4½ year highs, and the yen is set for its strongest monthly performance against the US dollar since April 2025, as speculation of joint Japanese-US official intervention to support the Japanese currency persists.

The US dollar index, which tracks the performance of the greenback against six other currencies, was 0.22 per cent higher at 96.114, but it remained near four-year lows, having lost nearly 2.8 per cent since Jan 21, its steepest weekly decline since April 2025's "Liberation Day" market turmoil.

Trump said on Tuesday the value of the US dollar was "great", when asked whether he thought it had declined too much. Traders took his comments as a signal to intensify dollar selling, ahead of a Federal Reserve policy decision later on Wednesday.

"It shows there's a crisis of confidence in the US dollar," said Kyle Rodda, a senior market analyst at Capital.com. "It would appear that while the Trump administration sticks with its erratic trade, foreign and economic policy, this weakness could persist."

The weakness in the US dollar may offer a welcome respite to Japanese officials, but is already a source of concern for other regions. Two European Central Bank officials said on Wednesday that the strength of the euro could influence monetary policy.

Austrian central bank governor Martin Kocher told the Financial Times the ECB may have to consider another interest-rate cut if the strength of the euro starts to affect the outlook for inflation.

Bank of France Governor Francois Villeroi de Galhau said in a LinkedIn post that policymakers were "closely monitoring the appreciation of the euro and its potential impact on lower inflation".

This knocked the euro back by as much as 0.56 per cent to a session low of US$1.197025. The euro was last down 0.4 per cent on the day at US$1.19873, but still set for a 2 per cent gain this month.

"The US would like a stronger yen," said Societe Generale head of FX strategy Kit Juckes. "The Japanese certainly don't want an ever-weakening yen. So until it's gone a significant distance, everybody's on the same side."

The yen has been a major beneficiary of the drop in the US dollar this week, surging over 1 per cent to a three-month high of 152.10 per US dollar on Tuesday. It softened a touch on Wednesday, leaving the greenback up 0.3 per cent at 152.62.

Investors remain unconvinced about the impact of an actual intervention, especially because Prime Minister Sanae Takaichi is basing her snap election campaign on expanded stimulus measures. Japan's election is set for Feb 8. REUTERS
